Follows an heraldic description of the King
Coat-of-Arms:

three crosses-crosslet of the first.

Crest: A cubit arm in armour per pale or and sable, the gauntlet wholly of the last grasping a broken

There seems to be a tradition, several centuries old, that the King family derived its surname, and sprang from a line of West Saxon kings. However, there are no facts to support this tradition. There is also a suggestion that perhaps the name was given to some illegal issue of a king. This also seems preposterous to assert as there is no evidence or reason to sustain it. Any reasons given therefor must also apply with equal force to such surnames as Prince, Duke, Count, Bishop and numerous others which would make the suggestion seem absurd.

Two plausible theories have been advanced regarding the origin of the surname of King.

1. A king usually had attached to his service or person those who were known as his knights, squires, foresters, soldiers, guards and servants of various kinds and they were called the king's men, or the king's. It frequently happened that their very occupation, such as knight, squire, or forester, originated their surnames. Also, as they were the king's men, William, a king's guard, became familiarly called "William the king's", and in the course of time merely "William King." Too, estates held and owned by the king were rented to tenants, and these were called tenants of the king just as others might be tenants of a Bishop, or some other titled person, and in the course of time "Henry, tenant of the King" would be called merely "Henry King." Even towns have taken the name of King, coming from the fact that they were part of the king's estate. Thus, Kings-ton, on the Thames, County Surrey, England, derived its name from the fact that at an early date it was a royal demesne.

2. Another theory advanced ascribes the origin to the very ancient miracle plays. It is said that, in these plays, acted in public and favored by the church, the individual who played the part of the king, or who, in mediaeval pageantries and mock ceremonies, was monarch of the feast, would be habitually spoken of as the king, or as king, until the appellation so fastened itself upon him as to originate a lasting and hereditary surname.

As these two theories contain more points of logic, there is a probability that the surname originated with either one, or perhaps both.
